Freshers week

Get freshers week started with a bang

Freshers week is a great ice breaker, you get to meet lots of your fellow students, make new friends, possibly pick up a fling or two on the way, and induct your liver into life in further education. It's the best opportunity you're going to get to meet all your fellow freshers at once, but if you spend it in an alcoholic haze you'll be missing out.

"Our clients all tell us they wish they'd learned this stuff years ago, and that the graduates they hire could all do with a good dose of it. We can't roll back the clock for them, but we can give new undergraduates the benefit of our fun interactive sessions to help them make friends, dates and ooze charisma"

It's a huge and intimidating step for some making the leap from the well established comfort zone of school and home, to the uncharted territories of Uni life. The temptation to help boost your confidence with a drink, or eight, to help oil the wheels of your new relationships is very hard to resist, but unnecessary if you know the flirting skills that mother nature blessed us all with.

Whether you're making new friends, networking or pulling, you're using the same skills, to a greater or lesser degree!

Mastering how to give the impression of oozing confidence, even if the bottom has dropped out of your pint pot, is vital in attracting new friends.

- Knowing whether you're giving off the right signals to make friends and pull the object of your desires is vital to kick start your relationships.
- Being able to read and react to the secret flirting signals will rocket propel your chances of pulling.
- Learning what makes the opposite sex tick and why men and women have different approaches to forming relationships will give you the inside track on bagging the friends and dates you want.
- Avoiding flirting faux pas will stop you ruining the chances of quashing a beautiful relationship before it's had a chance to flourish.
- Mastering unwritten codes, like breast etiquette and hand shake sins, will set you up for skills for life that will help you breeze through your professional career.

Flirting and Charisma Expert Elizabeth Clark can give your Freshers all this and more in a fast, furious and funny, interactive session. Small and large audiences alike will enjoy this great advice and boost their confidence to get their Uni life kicked off to a great start.
